1. Make a list of at least 20 things you are good at. Take some time to focus on your strengths. Be open to where it can lead. For example, you might be telling yourself "I could never design websites" only to find out that you love making posters or signs for your group.

2. Figure out what you liked and did not like about jobs in the past. Discover what brings out your best work and makes you happy.

- What did I like most and least about my boss?
- What did I like most and least about the people I worked with?
- What was hard about working there?
- When were you happy there?
- What was my biggest accomplishment?

3. Talk to at least 3 people who have a job you might want to try. This is called an informational interview. Make a list of questions. Record your meeting with them if it is hard for you to take notes. For instance, if you want to work at a museum, you can ask someone who already works at a museum if you can plan a time to sit down and talk with this person and ask questions about their job.
4. Learn about jobs you think you might like to do. There are so many ways to learn new skills. Take an online class. Watch a YouTube video that explains the job. Do an internship. Read about the job.

What to do if your agency lacks creativity and only finds you jobs that are easy for them to help you with.

- Have more of a backbone with your agency and say that you do not want this job.
- Use person centered planning when it comes to employment.
- Be a broken record. Keep speaking up to find a job that you enjoy. You might get pressure from your agency because of the workforce crisis. It is not about putting you somewhere where it’s easier for them to manage. The support staff can easily support you in places like fast food or grocery stores, but they often lack the skills to support you in an office environment.
- Remember - This is your life.
